

Maryland Tenants' Rights: EVICTIONS

What is an Eviction?

A landlord's action to put a tenant out of his or her housing is called an eviction. An eviction is legal only if the landlord goes to court and obtains a judgment against the tenant and if a sheriff/constable is present at the time the tenant is put out of the unit. It is illegal (and in some places a crime) for a landlord to try to evict a tenant by changing the locks, terminating utilities or removing belongings. If your landlord tries to evict you without a court order, you should call the police immediately.

However, if a tenant abandons the premises or leaves it unsecured, a landlord may take action to secure the property which may include changing the locks. If the landlord takes an action to temporarily secure the property the landlord must give notice to the tenant and allow the tenant to take back possession of the premises.

A landlord must file the correct type of eviction case and prove the case in court. This brochure explains three common types of eviction cases filed in district court:

- 1) Tenant Holding Over;
- 2) Non-Payment of Rent;
- 3) Breach of Lease.

In certain jurisdictions, tenants may have additional protections under local laws that are not discussed in this brochure.

Tenant Holding Over

If your landlord gives you proper notice that your lease will not be renewed, and you do not move by the date given in the notice, your landlord can file a Tenant Holding Over action against you. If you have given oral or written notice to your landlord that you are moving at the end of your lease, and you do not move by that date, the landlord may also file a Tenant Holding Over action against you. To get an eviction order, your landlord must prove:

- The lease has ended and you were given proper notice to move, or
- You gave notice to move by a certain date and did not move.

In addition to an eviction order, your landlord may attempt to get a money judgment for any financial loss caused by you not moving at the end of the lease term.

What is Proper Notice?

If a landlord chooses to not renew your lease at the end of the term or if your landlord wants to end a periodic tenancy, your landlord must give you written notice.

Year-to-year tenancy:

90 days notice before expiration of current year

One year lease:

60 day notice before expiration of the lease term

Month-to month lease:

60 days notice before expiration of the tenancy

Week-to-week tenancy:

If there is a written lease, 7 days notice before expiration of the tenancy; if no written lease, 21 days notice before the expiration of the tenancy.

The landlord can only obtain a money judgment if you were personally served with the court papers.

Your landlord may continue to accept rent after you are sent the notice ending your lease, and even after the lease ends, if you have not moved.

Usually, you are legally obligated to pay rent as long as you occupy the unit.

If you believe you have a legal reason for not paying your rent, you should consult an attorney. If a judgment is entered against you, you have to move, even if you have paid your rent.

If you owe rent to the landlord when you move, the landlord may deduct the amount owed from your security deposit or sue you for it.

If you and your landlord decide that you should remain as a tenant, despite a prior notice to move, you should get the agreement to stay as a tenant in writing. The agreement should be signed and dated by the landlord.

Non-Payment of Rent

In a Failure to Pay Rent action, your landlord sues to evict you by claiming you have not paid rent. Your landlord must send you a Notice of Intent to File a Complaint for Summary Ejectment at least 10 days before filing a complaint against you in District Court.

You may win a non-payment of rent case if:

- You have already paid the rent your landlord claims is due, or if you have the rent with you in court, along with any late fees that may be due;
- You offered to pay the rent, but your landlord refused to accept it and you have the rent with you in court;
- Your landlord failed to send the 10-day Notice of Intent to File a Complaint for Summary Ejectment;
- Your landlord is required to be licensed under local law and does not have a license;
- Your landlord is suing you for something other than rent (security deposit, damages, etc.); or
- Problems in your home are a danger to your life, health or safety and your landlord knew about the conditions for a reasonable period of time, but did not make repairs; and you meet the requirements for raising a Rent Escrow defense. (See Maryland Legal Aid's Rent Escrow brochure for more information.)

If you have one of the reasons listed above or any other reason you think you do not owe the rent, you must go to court on the hearing date and tell the judge why you don't think you owe it.

You should bring to court all receipts and other papers that support your side of the case. You should also bring witnesses who might help prove your case. You should go to court even if you have paid the rent.

If the next month's rent becomes due before the court date, and if in the Complaint, your landlord asked for rent becoming due after the date of filing, but due by the date of trial, then your landlord can get next month's rent.

Even if the court enters a judgment against you, you may be able to stop your eviction if you pay the judgment plus court costs due. You have up until the time the sheriff/constable arrives at your home and the eviction begins to pay the total amount due. Your landlord does not have to stop the eviction if you only make a partial payment. To stop the eviction you must pay the judgment amount and court costs, and any Warrant of Restitution fee by cash, certified check or money order.

Foreclosure of right of redemption

You may not be able to stop the eviction by paying the judgment if you have too many judgments for non-payment of rent against you. If your landlord has had 3 judgments (4 in Baltimore City) entered against you in the last 12 months, on the 4th judgment (5th in Baltimore City), your landlord may ask the court to "foreclose your right of redemption."

If a 4th judgment (5th in Baltimore City) is entered against you and the judge grants your landlord's request to foreclose the right to redeem, your landlord can evict you even if you pay the judgment and court costs. You may avoid having a judgment entered against you that "forecloses your right of redemption" by paying all rent, late fees and court costs owed to the landlord at any time before the court enters the judgment at trial. If you live in public housing or certain types of subsidized housing, your landlord may not be able to foreclose your right of redemption. For specific guidance in this area contact Maryland Legal Aid or another legal entity.

Late fees

The landlord may charge you a late fee only if your lease allows the landlord to charge one, and if the late fee is not more than 5% of the rent owed. If the lease calls for a late fee of greater than 5%, it is a prohibited lease provision, and the landlord should not be entitled to any late fee.

Breach of Lease

In a Breach of Lease action, your landlord sues to evict you claiming you have failed to follow conditions or terms of your lease. For example, your landlord may claim there is someone living in your home who is not listed in the lease or there has been criminal activity in your home.

Before suing you for breach of lease, your landlord must give you 30 days written notice that you are in violation of the lease and ask you to move. (If the landlord alleges that you or a guest of yours is a clear and imminent danger of doing serious harm to themselves or others, the landlord may give you a 14-day written notice.) Your landlord must prove in court that:

- the lease was breached;
- that the breach was serious; and
- that the breach was serious enough that evicting you is an appropriate remedy.

Your landlord may continue to accept rent after you are sent the breach of lease notice and even after the lease ends, if you have not moved.

Usually, you must pay rent as long as you live in the unit. If you believe you have a reason for not paying your rent, you should consult an attorney. If a judgment for breach of lease is entered against you, you have to move, even if you have paid the rent.

You may win a breach of lease case if:

- There is no provision in your written lease giving the landlord the right to sue for breach of lease or you don't have a written lease;
- Your landlord did not give you proper notice;
- The alleged lease violation did not happen; or
- The alleged lease violation was not serious and should not result in an eviction. If you live in public or subsidized housing you may have additional protections from eviction and you should contact Maryland Legal Aid or another legal resource if a breach of lease action is filed against you.

- You have “cured” the breach, meaning you are no longer in breach of your lease. For example, if you did have someone not on your lease living with you, but they moved out.

Maryland has a state law that prohibits retaliatory evictions. Baltimore City, Baltimore County and Montgomery County have their own local retaliatory eviction laws. If you live in one of these jurisdictions, parts of the local law may apply when they are stronger than the state law. In addition, the state has a separate retaliatory eviction law to prohibit retaliation against tenants who have notified the landlord about lead paint poisoning hazards. Each of these laws is slightly different. If you believe your landlord is retaliating against you, you should contact Maryland Legal Aid or another legal resource.

Under the state law, your landlord cannot evict you, arbitrarily increase your rent, or decrease services to which you are entitled because you:

- made a good faith complaint to your landlord or a public agency about an alleged violation of the lease, violation of law, or condition at the property that is a substantial threat to the health or safety of occupants
- filed a lawsuit against your landlord; or
- are a member or organizer of a tenants’ association.

If you took part in one of these three types of activities and your landlord is attempting to evict you on that basis, you may claim as a defense that the eviction is retaliatory. In order to claim this defense, you must have been current on your rent at the time of the retaliatory action or have filed a rent escrow action. You may not claim this defense if you pay rent monthly and your landlord has had more than three judgments entered against you for non-payment of rent in the last 12 months. If you pay rent weekly, you cannot claim this defense if your landlord has obtained a judgment against you for nonpayment of rent five times in the 12 months prior to the beginning of the case, or if you have only lived in the property for six months or less, if the landlord has obtained three judgments. You may not claim this defense if the “retaliatory activity” took place more than six months after you complained to your landlord or did one of the other activities described above. The court can assess damages, attorneys’ fees and court costs against you if your claim of retaliation was not in good faith. Likewise, the court may award you damages, attorneys’ fees and court costs if you prove retaliatory actions by the landlord.

Post-Judgment Motions and Appeals

You should contact Maryland Legal Aid or another legal resource immediately after a judgment has been entered against you if you think you have a reason for filing a post-judgment motion or appeal. An attorney can evaluate your case, explain your options, and help you understand the technical requirements for filing a motion or appeal.

In most cases, if you appeal you will have a new trial in circuit court. If you are a tenant living in public housing or certain types of subsidized housing, your appeal in a breach of lease case will be an “on the record” appeal. This means you must order a transcript of the district court trial and the circuit court will decide the case based on what happened in district court. You may ask the court to waive the fees in filing an appeal.
